Executive Summary

When the year 2014 marked the fervour of street vendors' solidarity movement, it gave hope that harassment and extortion would end. Street Vendor (Protection and Regulation of Street Vending) Act 2014, a culmination of previous policies into a central legislation, promised to be an authoritative take on the issue of freedom of business and trade of street vendors as enshrined under Article 19(1) (g) of the Constitution. However, as the study makes it evident, the non-compliance with the prescribed timelines has reduced the authority of the central Act to a mere piece of paper in some states.

The report studied the status of compliance of the Act in Indian states and came across a prevailing state of inertia amongst the state governments in executing the Act in its true letter. In doing so, we prepare an Index of Compliance, rating states on estimates that reflect their commitment to comply with the Act. However, due to non-responsiveness of states to RTI applications and telephonic calls for data collection, not all states could be covered. The 23 states that have been studied in this report are marked on the basis of compliance factors that are mentioned in the Act namely formation of schemes, rules, Town Vending Committees (TVC), etc. Out of the 23 states, Nagaland scored a zero on our rankings and stands alongside other nine states who also scored a zero for not responding to our data collection process. Apart from this, there are only nine states that have crossed a 50 per cent mark in the compliance index. This reflects the indifference with which the states have dealt with the Act.

While analysing each factor separately, we found out there was no state that complied with the provision of forming schemes and rules within the statutory period of six months and 12 months respectively.

Moreover, we also came across selective compliance by many states where one parameter, for instance the conduction of survey, has been implemented but other complementing parameters have been ignored. This inconsistency may be costly. While analysing the judicial trends post the passing of the Act, we found out that there are high courts such as those in Bombay and Rajasthan that have either denied or ignored the applicability of the Act in some cases in their respective states. In addition, some high courts have ignored the contours of Section 3(3) of the Act which protects the vendor from eviction before a survey is done. Although there do exist some cases where the courts have given judgments that favours the economic freedom for street vendors, the looming number of unfavourable judgments have subjected the vendors to the whims and fancies of the local authorities. We believe that the overall compliance of the Act in its true spirit has been anything but satisfactory in most of the states. What increases the vulnerability of the vendors is the lukewarm response that they have received from the judiciary. Therefore, if the street vendors are to be assured of the protection and justice that they fought for so many years, in its true spirit, the state governments need to be held accountable for the effective, efficient and encompassing compliance as well as the compliance of the central Act.

Abstract

In the words of Dr B.R. Ambedkar, “A common man needs bread, a house, adequate clothing, education, good health and above all the right to work with dignity on the world’s boulevards.” Street Vending is a huge informal sector in India and offers employment to several millions in the country. In order to regulate and protect the street vendors in India, the Parliament has enacted the Street Vendors (Protection of Livelihood and Regulation of Street Vending) Act 2014. The onus of creating rules under the Act rests on the states and subsequently, they devolve compliance and regulation to the local bodies. Yet, states have made unequal efforts in complying with and implementing the Act in letter and spirit. This report tracks the status of compliance of the Act across India, statewise, and develops an index to assess their performance.

Introduction

The street vendors' right to carry out their trade in public spaces has been the subject matter of numerous debates and petitions in India. The Supreme Court has recognised their interest and has passed various judgments to prevent the harassment and abuse of the vendors by state enforcement agencies. Finally, in 2014, the Street Vendors (Protection of Livelihood and Regulation of Street Vending) Act 2014 (in short "the Act") was passed. The Act aims to regulate and protect street vendors in India, at multiple levels.

While the Act is generally laudable, it has fallen short of expectations in several ways. For instance, even though the Act provides for the timelines for the formulation of the scheme and the rules, it lacks any provisions for a penalty for non-compliance with the deadline. It does not even grant deemed approval for vendors, that is, a license deemed to be granted if the application for license is not rejected within the stipulated time limit. Therefore, undue delays harm the hawkers/vendors and benefit police and bureaucracy. Not surprisingly, most states and the local authorities are lagging behind the timelines prescribed under the Act. This delay also implies the continuance of atrocities against the vendors; they are evicted from their zones without due process and relocation, extortion of money by the police and local authorities and confiscation of their goods and equipment (Tauhid, 2014). Surprisingly however, courts have also been largely reluctant to apply the law and protect the vendors.

Legislative drafting not only demands careful selection of phrases and a set of practically benevolent objectives but it must also take into account the interests and incentives of various stakeholders involved in the sector. Information available with each of the stakeholder to achieve its interests while creating legal rights and obligations becomes important here as well. This report is a step in the direction of understanding what happens once an Act is passed, with regard to its compliance.

The report fulfils several functions. It briefly collates the history of the Act and illustrates the reasons for its relevance. It discusses the status of compliance of the Act in India by way of doctrinal research and examines core legal problems that exist amongst vendors. Most importantly, it constructs a matrix to rank states on the status of compliance of the Act. This benchmarking project employs various methods to collect information on the status of compliance, including filing applications under the Right to Information Act, 2005 across states of India, making more than 250 phone calls to expedite the RTI reply process and referring to secondary sources such as news stories.

History of the Street Vendors Act 2014

The question of a trader's right over public roads is almost as old as the Constitution of India, and quite like a sinusoidal curve in terms of Court's imagination of private usage of public space like roads.

Way back at the beginning of the first decade of independent India, the state of Uttar Pradesh faced a legal challenge when it attempted to prohibit private traders to ply buses on public roads. Uttar Pradesh government passed an Act to ban the private corporations to ply buses on the public roads. The legislation was challenged, and the matter went to the Supreme Court. In the case of Saghir Ahmad v. State of U.P. and Ors (1954), the Apex Court held that the state is only a trustee of the public roads on behalf of the public. Therefore, the state only has a duty to regulate and see that the use does not create a conflict of rights, but it cannot monopolise and prohibit the use of public roads for private gain. The Court went ahead to say that the right extends to all forms of traffic which have been usual and accustomed and also to all which are reasonably similar and incidental to it. The Court further clarifies that public cannot be denied to do business on public roads and streets, however, putting reasonable restrictions and regulating it is the state's duty.

Surprisingly then, the same Court in 1967 changed its position over the nature of state's right over public roads and streets from being a trustee to the sole governor. The government in the case of Pyare Lal etc. v. New Delhi Municipal Corporation (1967) filed a counter-affidavit saying that the petitioner holding a temporary tehbazari permit has no right or interest in the land belonging to New Delhi Municipal Corporation. While the Supreme Court echoed the same the same in its judgement, it further objected to cooking on the street and observed that the N.D.M.C. should have never allowed the petitioner to do business involving cooking and 'create permanent unhygienic conditions'.

In 1985, the Supreme Court in Bombay Hawkers Union and Ors. v. Bombay Municipal Corporation and Others quashed a condition of the proposed scheme on regulating vendors which prohibited the hawkers from selling cut fruits, food items and like. The Court acknowledged the practical situation that many working families depend on such hawkers for food and like needs; therefore, there is no point in not allowing such hawkers to carry out business, though with restrictions on the practice of adulteration. However, the Court in contradiction to the view held in Saghir Ahmad's case held that that public streets are meant for the use of the general public and "not for carrying out private trade or business". It is confusing as to whether the Court considers street vending to be useful for general public. One can find the Court legislating details here – hawkers cannot put up stalls or handcrafts, but they can protect their wares from the sun, rain, wind; the hawkers should be allowed to hawk until ten at night; the authorities must work in consultation with the street hawkers.

In the same year of 1985, the Supreme Court faced another petition, Olga Tellis and Ors v Bombay Municipal Corporation involving eviction of pavement-dwellers. The Court holds that the right to life includes right to livelihood without which there can be no life. Further, the Court in this matter said that it would be impractical to ask for evidence to show that eviction from pavements would lead to an end to the means of livelihood, it is a common sense view and need not be established in particular cases. Despite paying tribute to Right to life and livelihood, the Court observed that the private use of a footpath or pavement being an unintended use, frustrates the intended purpose, and concluded that encroachments were illegal and equivalent to trespass. As a safeguard, the Court mandated the general rule of audi alteram partem to be followed, and held that a pavement dweller, even though he is an encroacher must not be evicted without a fair manner and procedure which includes an alternate to such dweller.

Alternative provision – this requirement was turned upside down by the same Court three years later (Municipal Corporation of Delhi v. Gurnam Kaur, 1988). In this case, where the Delhi High Court ordered the local authority either to construct an alternative stall or let the petitioner construct, the Supreme Court on appeal laid down that there is no such legal obligation on the state authorities in respect of dwellers whom it evicts. The Supreme Court did talk about rehabilitation, but also observed that there is no right to do business so as to cause a nuisance on a public street which is meant for the use of general public. Further, it also said that the petitioner cannot raise the issue to threat to life and liberty under Article 21 at the appeal stage at Supreme Court, inter-alia, because he had not raised the same before the High Court, whereas the same court just 3 years back in the case of Olga Tellis (1985) said that the issue of violation of or threat to a fundamental right to life could be raised at any stage.

However, in the same year a Constitution Bench by its judgment dated 30th August 1989 in Sodan Singh and Ors. v. New Delhi Municipal Committee and Ors., came to the conclusion that Article 19(1)(g) of the Constitution is available to street vendors, subject to proper regulations. It held that all public streets and roads in the country vest with the State which acts as a trustee on behalf of the public and the members of the public are entitled as beneficiaries to use them for trading as a matter of right subjected to the rights of other citizen. There were two interesting points – the Court refused to recognise any property right at a particular spot; secondly, it negated the submission based on Article 21 and found it inapplicable to street vending.

The question about the right of the hawkers as a fundamental right under Article 19(1)(g) was yet again opened in the case of Navi Mumbai Hawkers & Workers Union & others v. the State of Maharashtra & others (1998). While upholding the fundamental right to hawk in the hawking zones as guaranteed by Article 19(1)(g) of the Constitution of India, the High Court of Bombay found the requirement for a certificate of residence for 15 years in the state as unreasonable.

Further again in the case of Maharashtra Ekta Hawkers Union v. Municipal Corpn., Greater Mumbai (2004), the Supreme Court got into designing regulations and suggested that the permission for hawking is to be given considering factors like the narrowness of the road, free flow of traffic or movement of pedestrians is hindered or where for security reasons an area is required to be kept free or near hospitals, places of worship, etc. The Court observed that it has in previous cases also recognised the fact that if properly regulated, the small traders can considerably add to the convenience and comfort of the general public, by making available ordinary articles of everyday use for a comparatively lesser price.

Lastly, in the year 2010 in the case of Gainda Ram & Ors. v. MCD (2010), the Court did uphold the right to sell on the streets for the poor but also recognised the need for municipal authorities to regulate activities on the street. The Court went on to observe that there is a need to enact a legislation to regulate hawking and the rights of street vendors.

Subsequently, the Street Vendors Policy 2004 was introduced with the objective

This Act was drafted with the legislative intent of protecting the livelihood rights of street vendors as well as regulating street vending through demarcation of vending zones, conditions for and restrictions on the street vending.

“All public streets and roads vest in the State but the State holds them as trustees on behalf of the public. The members of the public are entitled as beneficiaries to use them, as a matter of right and this right is limited only by the similar rights possessed by every other citizen to use the pathways. The State as trustees on behalf of the public is entitled to impose all such limitations on the character and extent of the user as may be requisite for protecting the rights of the public generally.”

- Venkatarama Ayyar, J. (in CSS Motor Service, Tenkasi & Ors. v State of Madras and Anr. AIR 1953 Mad 279)

of providing and promoting a supportive environment for street vendors in India. However, the states failed to implement the national policy and the Supreme Court called for better compliance by the states under the national policy expeditiously.

Due to a lack of clarity in the judicial decisions, in 2009, the Street Vendors Policy 2004 was revised as the 'National Policy on Urban Street Vendors 2009'. The revised policy was not legally binding and made little progress on the matter of street vendors. In 2010, the Supreme Court directed the government to enact a law regulating street vending, and thus, the Street Vendors Bill 2012 was drafted. The Bill established a uniform legal mechanism for the regulation of street vending in the country. Under the Bill, the proposed legislation was recommended to be covered under Items 20, 23 and 24 of the Concurrent List under the Indian Constitution. It also made provisions for demarcating areas of vendors and prohibiting the leasing or renting of the vending sites.

The Bill was passed in both houses by February 2014 and became the Street Vendors (Protection of Livelihood and Regulation of Street Vending) Act, 2014. This Act was drafted with the legislative intent of protecting the livelihood rights of street vendors as well as regulating street vending through demarcation of vending zones, conditions for and restrictions on the street vending. The Act now governs over all matters regarding the rights and duties of the street vendors in India.

There is, therefore, a need to ascertain the status of the compliance of the Act. This holds great importance to determine whether the legislative intent with which the Act was formulated is fulfilled or still stands unattained.

Solidarity Movement Leading to the Enactment

In the wake of economic reforms in the 1990s, while the economy was increasingly connecting with the world, street vendors remained heavily regulated.

In the period ranging from 1998-2003, some street vendors' organisations, trade unions and labour groups came together on a common platform to form National Association of Street Vendors of India (NASVI). It helped the vendors to approach various courts for their rights and led to certain judicial pronouncements in their favour.

Nationwide mobilisation of vendors as pressure groups influenced the Government of India to bring in National Policy for Street Vendors in 2004.

Meanwhile, Centre for Civil Society also started a state level campaign called "Jeevika" in Rajasthan and Bihar around this period (2009-2012) that finally resulted in state level legislations. Other organisations such as SEWA in Gujarat and Manushi in Delhi played an important role in organising street vendors and undertook litigation to safeguard their interests.

Due to mounting pressure on political parties coming from street hawkers pressure groups, the Parliament finally enacted the central Act after it was passed by Rajya Sabha on 19th February 2014. The Street Vendors Act 2014 aims to protect the livelihood rights of street vendors as well as regulate street vending through participatory bodies called Town Vending Committees, demarcation of vending zones, conditions for and restrictions on the street vending. The major features of this Act include the right to vend, the constitution of a town vending committee, the prevention of harassment and the creation of a redressal mechanism.

Regulation of Street Vending

Section 3-11 provide for the regulation of street vending and the licensing of the street vendors. The statute directs the TVC to conduct surveys within the area under their jurisdiction for the identification of all the street vendors. Such surveys are to be carried out every five years, and the lists of the identified vendors have to be accommodated in the vending zones. It also makes provisions for the prohibition of eviction and relocation till the survey is complete and the vendors are provided with the vending certificates upon the submission of an undertaking. These certificates are only granted to those vendors who have completed the age of fourteen. The statute also provides for the supply of temporary licenses to those vendors who have initiated their trade between the gaps of two surveys undertaken by the TVC. A key provision also mentions that there shall be a formal capacity of each identified vending zone and where the number of vendors exceeds the capacity of the zone, the allocation of spaces is to be selected through a draw of lots. The vending certificate is non-transferable and is obtained after the payment of certain base fees, and the same can only be handed over to the spouse or beneficiary child of the vendor in case of his death.

The Right to Vend

Section 12-17 of Chapter III highlight that the street vendors have complete right to carry on the business of street vending if they possess the certificate of vending and in the limits of the prescribed vending zones. It emphasises on the legitimacy of street vending as a profession. A certificate of vending will be binding documental proof of the same and shall be extended to the jurisdiction of the vendor in case he is relocated from the original spot. The vendors have to abide by the cleanliness and public hygiene norms in the vending zones and the adjoining areas and have to pay for a base maintenance fee for ensuring the same to the Municipal Corporation.

Eviction and Relocation of Street Vendors

Section 18, 19 provide for the rights of the street vendors in cases of evictions and relocations. The statute provides that the local authority may, on the recommendations of the TVC, declare a zone or part of it to be a non-vending zone for any public purpose and relocate the street vendors vending in that area, in such manner as may be specified in the State scheme. It also allows for the evictions of those vendors whose certificates have expired or cancelled. But such evictions and relocations are to be undertaken only by the service of a 30-day notice by the local authority. Further, those vendors who have failed to vacate the place after the expiry of the notice shall be liable to pay the penalty up to Rs 250 for every day. This amount is exhaustive to the amount of the goods seized, and such seized goods are to be given back to the vendor upon payment of the specified fees. It is pertinent to note that where the goods seized are of perishable nature; the authorities have to release the goods immediately on the demand of the vendor.

Redressal Mechanism

The Act, in Chapter V, prescribes a government redressal committee which will consider the application of the street vendor and take steps for redressal by the rules set. It also allows vendors to appeal to a local authority if preferred. The Street Vendors Act 2014 also provides for the creation of three kinds of zones – restriction free vending zone, restricted vending zone, and no vending zone. The local authorities, taking into account surveys, are to create vending zones, where there are no restrictions on street vendors to whom the certificate of vending have been issued. Similarly, no vending zones are to serve as areas where street vendors are prohibited from selling their good due to lack of sidewalk space or congestion of roads and pedestrians.

REGULATORY CONUNDRUM

- As per section 5, one should have “no other means of livelihood” to be eligible for street vending. Although the provision may have a noble objective, but how will this be proved?
- Section 5 prohibits transferability of Certificate of Licensing. Restrictions on consensual transactions are usually difficult to enforce. How will this be done?

Plan for Street Vending

According to the second schedule of the Act, this plan is meant to be prepared by local authorities in consultation with the TVC. It involves laying down vending zones, non-vending zones and restricted zones for various markets. Civic amenities have to be created and regulated. The state government shall frame a scheme for street vendors. The local authority shall, in consultation with the planning authority, frame a street vending plan once every five years. The vending zones are to be determined after consultation with the First Schedule of the Act. Clause 3 of the First Schedule lays down principles for determination of no-vending zones. Over-crowding and sanitary concerns cannot be grounds of declaration of no-vending zones. Demarcation cannot be done before the survey as per 3(e) of the First Schedule and yet many courts including the Supreme Court have held otherwise.

Town Vending Committee

TVC is the pivotal element of this Act. It is a participatory decision making body with representatives of government officials, municipal officers, street vendors, bankers, traffic police, NGOs, RWAs. TVC can conduct or order for a survey, registers vendors, gives certificate of vending, decides on allocation of spots, gives recommendations on zoning and maintain records.

Prevention of Harassment

Section 27 overrides all laws including

REGULATORY CONUNDRUM

- In the absence of any penalty against undue evictions in the Act, how will the courts ensure no abuse of power by police or municipal officials?
- Are evictions invalid if a notice is not served as per the Act? How will this be enforced?
- Will the hawkers need to prove that they have been hawking since the Act has been notified, to claim protection under section 3(3) of the Act?

various municipal corporation laws to accord protection to street vendors, provided vending is done as per the terms and conditions of certificate of vending.

Penal Provisions

There is penalty for street vendors for indulging in vending activities without a certificate of vending, for contravening the terms of certificate of vending. But there is no penalty for undue eviction, harassment, extortion applicable to police, municipal official. There is no liability of government agencies for not implementing the Act.

Drafting of Schemes and Rules

Although the Act prescribed deadlines for notifying rules and the scheme to avoid regulatory delays, there is no liability to ensure that this mandate is complied with. The Act naively presumes that the government machinery will act and draft rules and the scheme within the stipulated time proactively. There are no model rules or scheme prescribed by the Union Government.

REGULATORY CONUNDRUM

- Who will represent pedestrians in TVCs? Pedestrians are not organised as an interest group and have no representation as an association or union. Residents Associations and shopkeepers are usually concerned with parking lots, vendors with vending spots; who will raise the issue of footpaths in TVCs?

Status of Compliance amongst States - Case Laws

Eviction before Survey and TVC

In various circumstances, it has been seen that evictions of the street vendors take place without following the due process mentioned in the Act. This is why the Report assumes greater importance. The rationale of the Act is justified in its appropriate usage. For as long as the states remain non-compliant with the Act, protection and regulation of street vendors will only remain on paper.

For instance, in Vaiso Jain v. NDMC and Anr (2011), the petitioner was an “unauthorised” vendor and claimed to carry out his vending activities at Connaught Place, New Delhi since 1989, though he did not have a permission or license. NDMC conducted an inspection of entire Connaught Place and found that the petitioner was violating the terms and conditions of the order and also the provisions of the Street Vendors Act, thereunder petitioner was removed. Section 3(3) of the Act says that eviction of street vendors can be done after the survey is completed. The Court held that petitioner is entitled to protection as the Street Vendors Act is in force on 18th May 2016.

In Mahatma Gandhi Sirukadai Vyaparigal Nala Sangam v. Secretary to Government, Local Administration (2016), the Madras Court deferred the matter to the Town Vending Committee (to be constituted) and directed the respondents to implement the provisions of the Act and register the petitioners as street vendors. Same Court, in V.P. Stalin v. The Commissioner of Police (2015), held that the street vendor was entitled to protection under sub-section 3 of Section 3 of the Act against eviction.

In the case of S. Selvam v. Thiruvavur Municipality, (2015), Madras High Court took a different stand however. The petitioners prayed to the Court to direct the municipality to form Town Vending Committee. But the Court ordered the municipality to hear the representation of petitioners regarding eviction. The Court also overlooked section 3 which clearly requires the authorities to not to carry out any eviction before conducting the survey and granting certificates.

Eviction due to traffic issues

Interestingly, traffic concerns have emerged as important reason for eviction of these vendors. There are at least four cases for the same.

The Gujarat High Court in the case of Vishnumurthi Gopalbhai Acharya v. Vadodara Mahanagar Sewa Sadan (2014), directed the state government to tackle the problem of traffic caused due to street vendors as per previous court orders (passed before the Act coming into force) in addition to the Central Act. This appeared to be confusing as the Act clearly prohibits eviction before the conduction of survey. The judgments does not state anything about survey or discuss any relevant provision.

The High Court of Bihar in the case of Chandra Kishore Parasar v. State of Bihar (2015) asked the state government to earmark vending zones while passing orders to address the problem of traffic. The Court without discussing the provisions of the Central Act suggested that the state can relocate and shift the street vendors after making vending and no-vending zones and can accommodate those who cannot be shifted to new vending areas in schemes like MGNREGA.

Zoning before survey

In case of non-compliance, ‘no vending zone’ is a contentious issue. Municipal Corporation or other concerned authorities in many places have declared a hawking zone as ‘no vending zone’ before constituting Town Vending Committees. Section 3 clearly provides that ‘no street vendor’ shall be evicted or relocated before the survey is carried out and certificates are issued. The Act nowhere mentions a distinction between street vendors vending in unidentified zones and no-vending zones demarcated as per previous schemes. This is a clear violation of the Act though high courts have taken different views.

In the case of Hawkers Adhikar Suraksha Samiti v. Union of India (2016), the Delhi High Court said that no-vending zones created before the passing of Street Vendors Act, 2014 are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act. The Court also overlooked the direction of the Supreme Court in Maharashtra Ekta Hawker's Union & Ors. vs. Municipal Corporation, Greater Mumbai & Ors., that the National Policy on Urban Street Vendors, 2009 should be implemented throughout the country till the Street Vendors (Protection of Livelihood and Regulation of Street Vending) Bill, 2012 becomes the law. Now continuing evictions by this scheme is not only ultra vires the Act but also a non-compliance of the direction of Supreme Court. The Court also observed that due to several compliance lapses, no-vending zones under the Act have yet not been formed. This view of the Delhi High Court gives the eviction authorities powers to evict the hawkers and street vendors who are vending in the no-vending zones created by previous schemes and regulations till a fresh zoning is done under the Act after due process. Therefore, the delay in a complete compliance of the Central Act is causing grave prejudice to the street vendors who were supposed to be protected by the Act. This view has been upheld by the Supreme Court in Ajay Maken v Commissioner of Police (2016) though the petition was dismissed without going into the merits of case. However, in Heritage City Thhadi-Thhela Union and Anr. V Jaipur Municipal Corporation and Ors (2016), the Supreme Court asked for an undertaking from the State Government. The counsel on behalf of the respondent government gave an undertaking that it would consult the Town Vending Committee, when constituted, on the already-marked no-vending zones.

Interestingly, in Shri Vile Parle Kelvin Mandal and Ors. v. Municipal Corporation of Greater Mumbai and Ors., (2011), the Bombay High Court held that the government authorities cannot evict the hawkers even if they are hawking within 100 m of place of worship, hospital or educational institution, in contravention of directions issued in Maharashtra Ekta Hawkers Union and others

v. Municipal Corporation of Greater Mumbai and Ors. (2004) by the Supreme Court. The Court observed that the directions given by the Supreme Court had ceased to apply after the central Act came into force.

No applicability of the Act

Some of the high courts such as Bombay, Kerala, Rajasthan in some judgments were either reluctant or ignorant of the Act.

In the case of CCS v. State of Rajasthan (2015), the Rajasthan High Court stated that the Central Act is not applicable in the state of Rajasthan. The Court observed that the notification dated 1st May 2014 did not specifically mention Rajasthan, therefore, the notification did not make the Act applicable to Rajasthan. Interestingly, the notification did not mention any specific state as it applied to the whole of India. This judgment was challenged before the Supreme Court. For details, please see the case study.

The Bombay High Court in Azad Hawkers Union, Mumbai v State of Maharashtra (2014) as well as in Malad Pheriwala Sanagathan v Municipal Corporation of Greater Mumbai (2014) did not even mention the Act though both the judgments were passed after 1st May 2014.

Cooking on streets

Street Vendors Act of 2014 also provides for modes and manners of conducting street vending. It can be easily understood by cases mentioned below.

In the case of National Association of Street Vendors of India v. South Delhi Municipal Corporation (2014), the High Court of Delhi ruled that the Municipal Corporation is incorrect in issuing public notices which had put a six month prohibition on street vendors selling cut fruits and other such food articles which attract flies and are exposed to dust. The Court among other things emphasised on section 3 of the Street Vendors Act, 2014 which require carrying out of surveys and give protection against eviction till the survey process is complete, chapter 8 which protects the street vendors against harassment and section 33 of the Act which gives it overriding powers over other laws.

In Shri Vile Parle Kelvin Mandal and Ors. v. Municipal Corporation of Greater Mumbai and Ors., (2011) the Bombay High Court held that a street vendor could sell only ready food items, but he is not entitled to cook or make food items at the place of vending. Cooking of food by a street vendor at the place of vending is not at all contemplated by the Street Vendors Act. Thus, those Street Vendors who are cooking food at the place of vending will not be covered by the definition of the Street Vendors under the Street Vendors Act and therefore are not entitled to protection under the Act.

Certificate of Vending

Licensing is an indispensable part of carrying out the business of street vending. Presently, there is a lot of ambiguity in this process because the Act does not provide a clear picture about whom a license shall be given to, whose license shall be valid, and other such concerns.

The Bombay High Court in the case of Juhu Nagar Pheriwala Sanghathan v. State of Maharashtra (2016) asked the vendors for a proof that they were hawking as on the cut off date of 1st May 2014, when the Act came into force, to be able to claim protection under the Act.

In Asif Pasha v. The Commissioner (2015), petitioners were street vendors and carried out their business in small temporary constructions or sheds raised by them at public places. Mysore City Corporation evicted them from their respective places, where they were carrying out their business on a day-to-day basis. Petitioners requested that being poor self-employed people, they are entitled to the protection under the recently enacted Act. The Karnataka High Court held that petitioners were at liberty to approach the respondent Municipal Corporation for seeking appropriate license and permission to carry on their street vending business at a designated place complying with the conditions of such license as may be imposed by the Municipal Corporation regarding the Act of 2014.

In the case of Rasheed V.K. v. State of Kerala (2014), the Court simply deferred the issue of licensing to the municipal corporation and laid down that the authorities should not evict the petitioners until their claim for the license is considered by the corporation.

Miscellaneous

In the case of Bhikharam Chandmal Sweets and Snacks Pvt. Ltd. v. Mayor, Kolkata Municipal Corporation (2016) the Calcutta High Court while safeguarding the interests of a shopkeeper directed the authorities to ensure smooth passage to the shop but at the same time, refused to pass any order to evict the vendors surrounding the shop. It also observed that evictions under section 372 of the Kolkata Municipal Corporation Act, 1980 cannot be carried out due to the overriding protection granted by the central Act.

“Street hawkers create dirt and nuisance... If they were to be conceded the right claimed by them, they could hold society to ransom by squatting.”

Rajasthan – A Case Study

It was January 2015. Some vendors informed iJustice team (legal wing of Centre for Civil Society) that they are still harassed by the police and often evicted. The team decided to make a visit to the Pink City.

There were trucks, police vans, some police officers including senior ones and municipal officials present at the eviction site. It was a typical eviction drive that one usually sees in a market full of vendors such as Sarojini Nagar in Delhi. Fear, extortion and violence – all legitimised, except it was not “legitimate” this time.

The team went to a police station – Vaishali Nagar, and asked the cops there to lodge an FIR against an illegal eviction drive. But cops simply refused. When the lawyers showed them the new law, cops laughed and said, “Ye kanoon Rajasthan mein lagoo nahi hota (this law is not applicable to Rajasthan).” A law duly passed by the Parliament was being mocked by the state police.

The team helped vendor in filing private complaints in the Magistrate Court. Meanwhile, a PIL filed by Centre for Civil Society and Heritage Thadi-Thela union was pending in the Rajasthan High Court for more than two years. Media Action Group - a public interest arm of Rajasthan Patrika picked up this issue of vendor harassment and extortion and questioned the non-enforcement of law. Within a month, the High Court decided on the PIL, holding that the Central Act was not applicable to Rajasthan. According to the High Court, the notification dated 1st May 2014 issued by the Union Government was not applicable to Rajasthan since it did not mention Rajasthan expressly.

Unambiguously, the notification applied to the whole of India except, of course, Jammu and Kashmir. iJustice Team forwarded this question to an MP’s office to be raised in the Parliament. The reply given by the concerned minister in Parliament reaffirmed the obvious. CCS and Heritage city Thadi-Thela filed an appeal in the Supreme Court in August 2015. The Apex Court asked the authorities to hear out the “grievances” of the vendors. But this was not what the vendors asked for. There was a judgment in question raising a question of law; it was not a grievance. Instead of deciding its correctness, the Court fixed up a meeting with the government officials. Could the parties alter the High Court judgment consensually if they agreed?

As anticipated, nothing came out of the meeting. Meanwhile, the evictions continued. The only ray of hope came in September 2015 when the Court directed “status quo to be maintained ...” Yet evictions continued. On the other hand, there were adjournments. Vendors filed a contempt petition against the Commissioner.

Finally, after eight months, Jaipur Municipal Corporation vide counter-affidavit (27th April 2016) gave an undertaking to abide by the status quo “till such time”, i.e. till the procedures as given in the Act are fully complied with. Lo and behold! JMC agreed that the central Act was applicable. Here is what JMC mentioned in its counter-affidavit:

“27. That it is again humbly submitted that the Respondent herein is making all efforts in its capacity to ensure the implementation of the 2014 Central Act as well as the 2016 Rules.

27. That in the light of the aforesaid it is humbly submitted that since the DB Public Interest Litigation Petition No. 6623/2012 is still pending before the Hon’ble High Court , this Hon’ble Court may be pleased to dispose of the present Special Leave Petition with a direction to the Respondents herein to act in accordance with the 2014 Central Act and the Rules framed by the State Government thereunder within a prescribed time-limit, and maintain status quo as ordered by this Hon’ble Court on 28.09.2015 in the present Special Leave Petition till such time.”

The state government had framed rules by then. A draft scheme is also available online. As per the RTI filed in Aug/ Sep 2016, no scheme had been notified yet. There was no further information available whether the scheme had been notified.

The Supreme Court passed the final order on 8th July 2016. The order merely recorded an undertaking given by the Rajasthan Government to abide by the Central Act, particularly comply with section 21.

Meanwhile, several street vendor associations approached the Rajasthan High Court and got the stay order against evictions from the single benches. The PIL filed by the Heritage City Thadi-Thela union was still being pursued by the union. The High Court pulled up the government officials several times for not constituting the Town Vending Committee (TVC). Finally, in March 2017, the Town Vending Committee was constituted. However, it did not have any representatives of the NGOs. The first meeting of the TVC is scheduled for 21 March 2017.

Methodology

Collecting data for this research was not as easy as it seemed to be initially. There was more to it than just looking for the notification issued by each state government and recording when the rules were framed and the scheme was passed. One also needed to go through news sources extensively, at times not even in one's native language or a language that Google can translate. We also relied upon emails, which were then followed by phone calls to the state's Urban Development Department. Both emails and phone calls provided an insight into the bureaucratic working of the Indian government offices, rather interestingly.

To begin with the data collection, first, an excel sheet of all the states had to be made. Following that, different parameters were picked up from the Act, which could be answered in a yes/no format. Upon doing so, we arrived whether the state had done the following:

- Drafted rules within a year
- Drafted rules after a year
- Framed a scheme in six months
- Framed a scheme after six months
- Conduction of survey
- Creation of Town Vending Committees
- Certificate of vending issued
- Constitution of a Dispute Resolution Committee/ appellate committee
- Plan for street vending
- Conduction of street vendor elections
- First meeting of TVC has taken place
- Publishing street vendors' charter

Assessment of parameters

The primary goal of data collection was to go through different stages of planning, compliance, and evaluation of the Act in each state respectively. Meanwhile, the objective was to assess that the states had gone through these stages or not and then rank them according to the actions that they had taken by allotting them the values (subjectively). In the end, social audit, publishing database, and publishing street vendors' charter had to be removed since there was not enough evidence available for them. Moreover, social audit takes place in every three years, and it has only been two years since the Act was passed. The last parameters to be added were the total number of towns, number of towns in which survey was carried out, and total number of town vending committees (TVC). These three parameters focus on the compliance stage of the Act, and it is with these three that one could truly assess the degree to which action had been taken by the state.

Stages of data collection

The first thing to be done was to look at the notifications for each state to find the dates for the rules and the schemes. It was confusing for a few states as some of them had a state Act regarding street vending, and their schemes and rules were quite similar to the one passed by the Central Government. The next stage was to look at media coverage of different states. There was not much printed about the Street Vendors Act, but there were several news articles on The Hindu, The Indian Express, and The Times of India. These articles helped in answering the parameters regarding conduction of surveys, certificates of vending, publishing of scheme in local newspapers, and TVC related parameters. If information was published somewhere, we could easily remove the false positives, even though risk of including true negatives remained. Hence, we resorted to RTIs as well.

RTI as a source

In total, we filed 31 RTIs and 18 appeals in the course of five months. RTIs were filed in 31 states and union territories, but only 23 states responded to the questions asked in “The states which failed to reply appropriately to the RTIs, phone calls were made to follow up. Surprisingly, few of them had no knowledge about the Street Vendors Act, 2014.”

GOVERNMENT OF PUDUCHERRY
LOCAL ADMINISTRATION DEPARTMENT

No. 12013 /DIR/LAD/RTI/2016-17

Puducherry, dt. 14.11.2016

To

Shri Prakash Sarang,
A-69, Hauz Khas,
New Delhi - 110 016.

Sir,

With reference to your RTI Appeal Petition dt. 7.11.2016 (Form-1 dt. 1.9.2016), it is informed that since the Director (LA)-cum-FAA is on long leave, your appeal petition will be taken up for consideration after he rejoins duty or until the alternative arrangement is made by the Government.

Yours faithfully,

(K. SARANGAPANI)
DEPUTY DIRECTOR (RD)

these applications. Many authorities wrongly interpreted the questions or ignored a few of them. Replies through RTI did not take into account the complete question or chose to answer only a part of it. This is reflected in the final data as Information Not Available (I.N.A.). Many states did not reply within time. Such a casual attitude of authorities in replying to RTIs made it very difficult to assess the information received through them. Out of the RTIs filed, only half were answered. The states which failed to reply appropriately to the RTIs, phone calls were made to follow up. Surprisingly, few of them had no knowledge about the Street Vendors Act, 2014. First appeals as per the "Right to Information Act, 2005" were also filed, and exhaustive attempts were made to gather information through RTIs, as this source is the most reliable. But only two to three appeals were successfully answered.

Despite trying all these ways, we did not receive enough information from six states.

Findings and Discussion

Ranking

We engaged with secondary surveys of each state in India and through a series of RTIs, pulled out the compliance status of the Act (refer to the Data Collection in Appendix). To objectively compare different states on the bases of their performance in implementing the Act, we selected important features of the Act which are not only identifiable but also definitional in their scope and objective. The Act mandates state to undertake a set of steps to streamline street vending activities in their respective states, and most of these mandates are institutionally observable. This means that given the nature and scope of the legislation, the compliance becomes visible if we look at administrative structures that have been adopted and established by the governmental bodies. For instance, the Act proposes that the States come up with their respective Rules accompanying the Act. For most states, we can gather this information. This becomes our variable. If a state has drafted rules, we safely assume that their compliance is better than the one where rules have not been drafted. We collect a series of crucial variables to map the differential status in the compliance of the Act and see which state fares better relative to the other. We create a Street Vendors Act – Compliance Index, abbreviating it as SVACI.

Indices are used to compose a statistical measure, capturing an extensive set of information/data in compressed form. One can think about them as an abstract or synopsis of a lengthy research piece, or better still, the title of the paper. It is a compound measure of multiple indicators and variables. The index is a summary, a ranking framework which uses relative grading to give a snapshot of a large dataset, without compromising any significant information. As a statistical measure, it estimates items which are empirically related to each other. At a general level, an index is a scale, which orders things relative to each other based on a formulaic prescription.

The index captures a series of variables that serve the twin purpose of having a material and significant impact on states' effectiveness in complying with the Act as well as being identifiable with little cost. The Act offers important mandates at the level of executive, leaving little outside the observable variables that we have captured in our study, which will have a significant impact on the Index. In other words, through our careful reading of the Act, we realise that variables which are not identifiable are the ones which would not have any impact on the compliance of the Act anyway. The Act has executive functions and makes specific administrative directives, carving out a compliance design.

Since preparing an Index of legislation is one of its kinds of efforts, we had to keep several things in mind. Firstly, the nature of data itself. Not all the variables which give an impression of how effective states have been are quantitative in nature. In fact, most of them have a binary choice variable, since estimating the strength of each attribute is very difficult to be observed. For this, we create this index with ordinal scale, in which relative position of items rather than the quantum of their difference becomes the measuring value. For most ordinal ranking, a scale (say of 1-10) is often the idea. We use values, relatively graded. This also means, that even for the few variables that have quantifiable attributes, we convert them into corresponding ordinal scales.

Second, the variables must be weighted. Not all the variables contribute equally in translating the Act into 'compliance.' We assign weights to the variables in proportion to their apportioned contribution towards effective impact. This weighting is done to ensure that unimportant variables do not influence the Index more than they ought to be, and important ones remain central.

Thirdly, data is not consistently available for all the states in a uniform manner. This is expected given the unorganised manner in which information is often inventoried (if at all) in local government offices. The note on data collection in Appendix illustrates the massive difficulty we faced in collecting the information. To address this problem, we have adopted two steps. First, we do not include states for which we lack more than 75 per cent of data. Since the considerable information was collected through filing RTIs in relevant departments in each state, as well as extensive rounds of phone calls, not receiving a satisfactory response encourages us to put these states at the bottom of the list. This is not to suggest that lack of information is translated as low SVACI, rather, it suggests that for states for which more than three-quarters of data cannot be found through primary and secondary sources, there is very little likelihood that they would have fared high in SVACI anyway. Second, we also assign lower weighting to variables which are not available for most states. This is justified due to the nature of the variables themselves. The Act is barely three years old, and there are variables for which compliance steps cannot be taken this early anyway. It is precisely this set of variables which has not been consistently available for most states, understandably. Hence, we award them low weighting. But since it is important that states which have gone faster and engaged with these attributes are rewarded for their efforts, we did not knock these variables completely.

Fourthly, we treat the information collected from different sources at their face value. We consider the quality of data same, regardless of whether it comes from an internet source, newspaper story, RTI reply or telephonic conversation. This may come at the cost of reliability, but at this stage, there is simply no other way to accommodate salient features of the Act and observe its relative compliance in the states. In other words, the only alternative to preparing an index with fixed sources of data is not to have an index at all. We believe that it is important to conduct the exercise and attract further refinement in time to come through other scholars or government departments themselves, rather than not undertaking it at all. Fortunately, we worked hard to ensure we get most of our data from reliable sources indeed. More importantly, the source of every data point has been provided, for future research and revisions.

Following table illustrates the estimates.

I	Variable	Weight	Ordinal Value
1	Rules drafted	14%	1 if drafted 0 if not drafted
2	Scheme drafted	13%	1 if conducted 0 if not conducted
3	Surveys conducted,	10%	1 if conducted 0 if not conducted
4	Town Vending Committee,	12%	1 if constituted 0 if not constituted
5	Share of towns in which survey is carried out,	10%	Normalized already to 1
6	Number of Town Vending Committees created,	10%	Per unit district, normalized to 1
7	Dispute Resolution or Appellate Committee,	6%	1 if constituted 0 if not constituted
8	Plan for Street Vending,	7%	1 if done 0 if not done
9	Street Vending Elections,	6%	1 if held 0 if not held
10	Town Vending Committee First Meeting,	6%	1 if held 0 if not held
11	Summary of Scheme in two local newspapers,	6%	1 if published 0 if not published
		Total 100%

Finally, there may be some state specific idiosyncrasies. For instance, Haryana has its Act and therefore does not have any rules or schemes. We treat it as fulfilling its criteria. Our data collection method explains and addresses many of these issues.

The index has been calculated based on the following formula for the score of each state:

$$SVC_n = \sum_{i=1}^{i=n} \alpha_i V_i$$

Where, n is the state for which score is being calculated, α_j is the weight accorded to variable V_j for i th attribute.

Expanding the score, V_i is

Rules drafted, $R \mid i=1$

Scheme drafted, $Sch \mid i=2$

Surveys conducted, $S \mid i=3$

Town Vending Committee, $TVC \mid i=4$

Share of towns in which survey is carried out, $N_s \mid i=5$

Number of TVCs created, $N_{tv} \mid i=6$

Dispute Resolution or Appellate Committee, $DR \mid i=7$

Plan for Street Vending, $P \mid i=8$

Street Vending Elections, $E \mid i=9$

Town Vending Committee First Meeting, $M_{tv} \mid i=10$

Summary of Scheme in two local newspapers, $S_s \mid i=11$

$$SVC_n = \alpha_1 R + \alpha_2 Sch + \alpha_3 S + \alpha_4 TVC + \alpha_5 N_s + \alpha_6 N_{tv} + \alpha_7 DR + \alpha_8 P + \alpha_9 E + \alpha_{10} M_{tv} + \alpha_{11} S_s$$

The ordinal values ascribed are equal to 1 or 0, depending upon when the said attribute is present or not, barring the following exceptions.

N_s will be the number as it is, which his normalized already to 1

N_{tv} will be number of town vending committees per unit districts, normalized to 1

We now discuss the assignment of weights. It is reasonable to give higher weight to variables that must be initiated or implemented earlier rather than later. For those attributes which take time to be built up, weights will be lower. The former is comprised of $\alpha_i V_i \mid i=1,2,3,4,5,6$ and the latter, $\alpha_j \mid j=7,8,9,10,11$. Next, within α_i , we give higher weight to factors which are prerequisites for other attributes and which have a higher bearing on Act's compliance.

Hence, $\alpha_1, \alpha_2 > \alpha_3, \alpha_4 > \alpha_6 > \alpha_5 > \alpha_8 > \alpha_7 > \alpha_{12} > \alpha_9, \alpha_{10} > \alpha_{13}$.

The weights indicate what are the values that are important than the others to indicate effective compliance. It helps the scale not be influenced by factors which are 'not that important,' to reflect a realistic assessment of compliance status of the Act.

Note that the change of weights will be necessary if we seek to assess other variables. For instance, if we want to examine the implementation rather than the compliance status of the Act, we may want to accord higher weighting to variables like street vending elections. This may alter the index and change relative positions of the state. Since this Report is focusing on compliance, altered indices with implementation variables securing higher weights is mentioned in the Appendix. There, we also reproduce the scale keeping the same weight to all variables.

Two important notes before we produce our findings. For all V_i $i=7,8,9,10,11$, we have two problems. Firstly, we lack data for far more states in this compared to other factors, making a number of entries filled in as 'NA.' We will assume these values to be zero, because we will assume that our extensive work to pull out the data using a number of methods, which included phone calls and RTI applications (see method of data collection in the Appendix), leading no information being provided or available, indicates either the lack of interest of the relevant state bodies or the values being insignificant – making the award of 0, in either cases, a reasonable assumption. One may say that we are penalising states for not providing the information; we contend that this may indeed be deserved. Note that due to very little weighting associated with these attributes, the impact on overall Index will anyway be little.

Secondly, these variables ought to be taken as continuous since setting up dispute resolution committees, plans for street vending, meetings of town vending committees and publication of summaries of schemes in two local newspapers may have taken place in few places and not all, thus making it necessary for taking up the share rather than a binary of 0 or 1. But because (a) the share is very small in almost all the states, and (b) this information even within the state may be incomplete, we resort to taking up ordinary values for them, regardless of the share. Since the weight of these factors is rather low, this assumption will not alter the primary conclusions.

Due to the paucity of data, we did not estimate scores for Arunachal Pradesh, Puducherry, Sikkim, Madhya Pradesh, West Bengal and Uttarakhand.

Table 1 (a) gives us a snapshot of the scores each state received in the SVACI metric. Delhi tops the list while Nagaland score zero. Notably, Chhattisgarh, Andhra Pradesh and Jharkhand have topped the list after Delhi. They are followed by the Northeastern states of Tripura, Manipur and Mizoram, which is indeed encouraging. This scores in the table are estimated by assuming

Table 1 (a): SVACI Scores assuming $n_a=0$

NA=0, and therefore, the states which were not included in the list also score zero, but we place them below Nagaland.

If only the states and variables with full information are looked at, the Index will look like shown in Table 1 (b). The difference between the two tables tell us, how sensitive are the states appearing in 1 (a) and not in 1 (b) to categories under which they did not have information. In other words, if a state that did not provide full information somewhere is lying higher in the score in Table 1 (a), it signifies that the state has lower sensitivity to missing variables and therefore the state of compliance is working out in desirable fashion in that state. Therefore, among the states with less information (and therefore missing out in 1 (b)), states like Maharashtra, Karnataka, Odisha, Punjab that lie above Tamil Nadu, Haryana, Rajasthan, are more effective in the compliance of the Act. Needless to mention, states with no information available (Arunachal Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Puducherry, Sikkim, West Bengal and Uttarakhand) perform the worst.

If we were to observe only those attributes for which most of the information is available, it would mean V_i $i=1, 2, 3, 4$. The scores for such an ordering are illustrated in Table 1 (c).

Table 1 (c): SVACI Scores estimated when $i=1,2,3,4$

Which of these scores are most reliable? Well, it depends on what is one looking for. A composite index of all the states gives a bird's-eye view of state's performance in a general sense. Since in this index, all 'na' have been equated to zero, it is better to view the grading of this scale rather than exact position. So one may not compare the states at the fourth and fifth position but the states at higher positions and lower. In some ways, the SVACI in 1 (a) could be re-worked as Group-Scale, with a discontinuity at large differences. So the revised scale would be:

Group A (best complying): Delhi, Chhattisgarh, Andhra Pradesh, Jharkhand, and Tripura

Group B (moderately complying): Maharashtra, Karnataka, Odisha, Punjab, Assam, Kerala, Bihar, Manipur, Mizoram and Goa

Group C (poorly complying): Gujarat, Uttar Pradesh, Meghalaya, Rajasthan, Haryana, Himachal Pradesh and Tamil Nadu

Group D (no compliance): Arunachal Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh, Nagaland, Puducherry, Sikkim and Uttarakhand

Note that Group D is collective of those states which did not provide us with any data, and given the extensive efforts we put in to fetch data, this group becomes a penalty for them not to respond. As stated earlier, it also acts as a proxy for poor performance, because any tangible effort would have no reason not to be revealed.

For purists in data, table 1 (b) makes more sense although we cannot rank every state in this case. Table 1(b) was constructed removing all data points for which there was no data available. The results are unalloyed with any assumption, although the scale remains shorter.

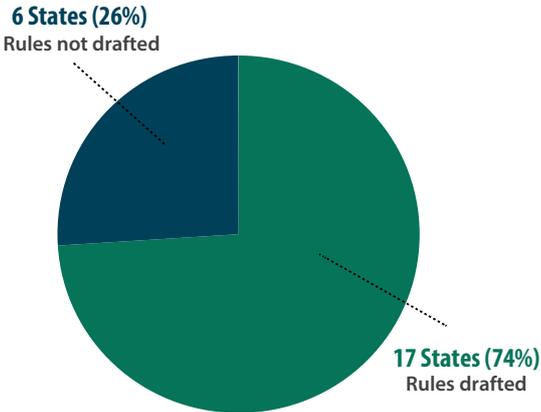

Table 1 (c) is ranked as if only Rules,

Schemes, Surveys and Town Vending Committees are considered to matter in assessing states' performance. This may be valuable for those who consider that it is a matter of time that other efforts are taken by the respective states. Using 1 (c) is a neat way of removing the 'na' data points because these variables are complete for almost all the states. In some ways, therefore, 1 (c) exhibits the true picture of states' differential performance. In other words, states falling behind in this table are the ones where the situation is indeed the worst because, for any effective compliance of the Act, one wonders what is the state doing if not even drafting Rules, for instance.

Parameter-wise compliance check

Rules

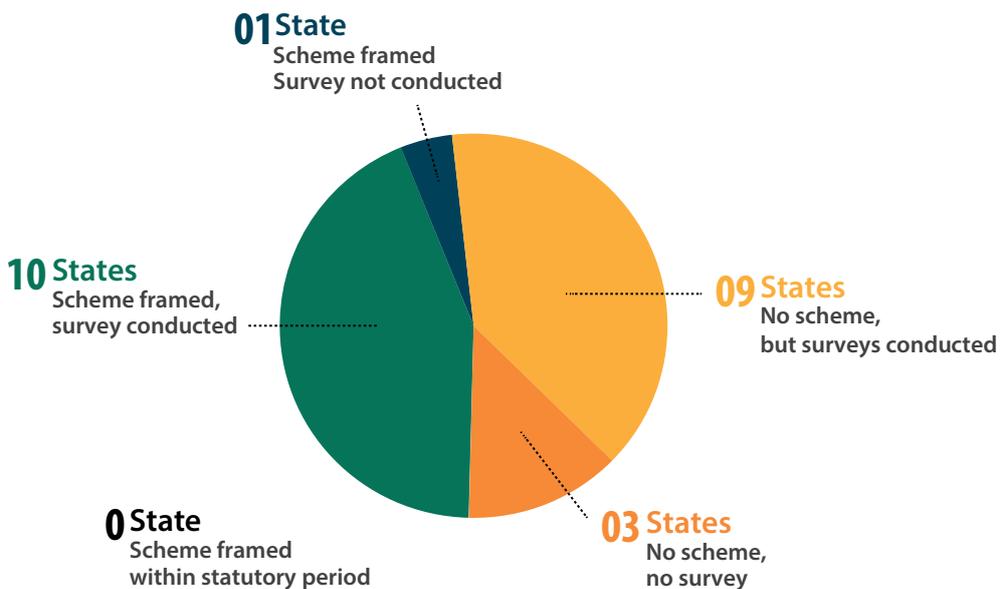

Pie-chart 1: Percentage of states that have framed rules.

The data above reveals a deliberate failure of the states to meet the objectives of the Street Vendors Act of 2014, which is to regulate street vending terms of the Act. The need which was highlighted by the Supreme Court way back in 1985, that the states must regulate street vending is still unmet. This lethargy and apathy for poor trying to have a respectful livelihood is not merely a failure of state machinery but is a policy level depravity. The Act mandated a year's time to frame state rules for street vending vide section 36, but does not entail a penal provision for not adhering to the time limit. The data above is a consequential implication of this lacuna in the legislation. The statutory time frame of drafting rules within one year from the passing of the Act (March 14th, 2014) was not met by a single state out of the 23 we study here. Whereas 17 states were able to frame rules after the expiry of this time frame, the status of implementation in general remains questionable as many of them have not yet framed a scheme under section 38. But the most disquieting aspect of the above data is that six states out of the states studied have not yet been able to frame rules.

Scheme

Section 38 of the Act provides for a six-month period starting from the date of passing of this Act for framing schemes, in consultation with local authorities and Town Vending Committees. But the chart above shows that none of the states out of 23 states under study was able to frame scheme in any of its Urban Local Body (ULB), even within stipulated one-year period since passing of the Act. This shows a lack of seriousness and commitment at the level of state governments towards a law which was framed after an exhaustive struggle of various stakeholders over a span of more than five decades.

Pie chart 2: Time taken by state governments to frame the scheme under section 38 of the Street Vendors Act, 2014.

However, five states were able to frame schemes in some of their ULBs within a period of two years, but only Delhi, Jharkhand, Mizoram and Maharashtra published the schemes in the local newspaper as mandated by section 38 (2) of the Act. Andhra Pradesh, Chhattisgarh, Tripura and Uttar Pradesh managed to frame schemes in some of their ULBs between periods of 24 months to 30 months after passing of the Act, but none of them published the schemes as per the Act. This means that only 48 per cent of the states have framed schemes till the writing of the Report and mere four out of 23 states have published them.

Surveys

According to section 3 of the Act, the Town Vending Committee shall conduct a survey in the manner and within such time as provided in the scheme under section 38. As the data above shows, four states have still not conducted surveys which mean that these states are still absolutely in the same position as were before passing of the Act. However, the number of states that have conducted surveys also do not reflect fulfilment of objects of the survey as the number of ULBs in which surveys have been done in each state is far below the actual number of ULBs in that state.

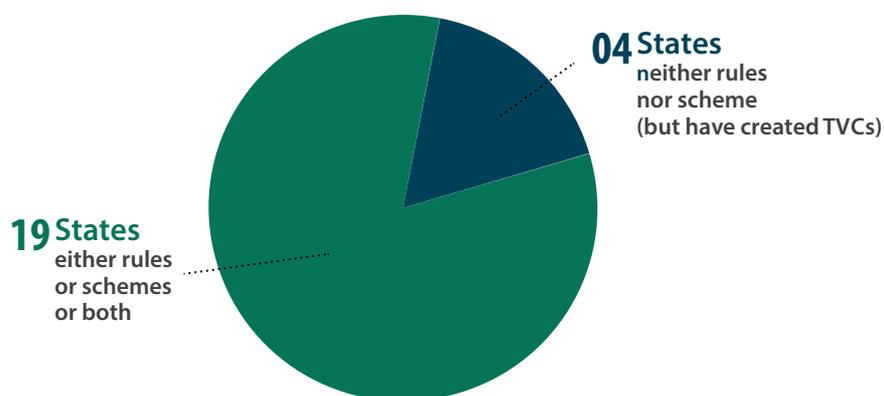

Though the Act provides that no street vendor should be evicted or relocated before conducting the survey, harassment is still continuing because of no clear demarcation of no-vending zones or restricted vending zones which were to be created after conducting surveys.

States with TVCs but without rules or scheme

Though after nearly three years, nineteen states have formulated either schemes or rules and eight of them have both but four states still have neither rules nor scheme. This means that these four states have still not acted at all for the basic compliance of the Act. However, surprisingly, six out of the eight states which have neither scheme nor rules, have created Town Vending Committees. This reflects a bypassing approach of the state governments towards the provisions of this Act. These states might have evaded the pre-requisites for constituting a TVC, which included provisions like reservations to the appropriate strata, adequate representation of social workers and functions like maintaining records and managing street vending under its jurisdiction, or for the TVCs to have social audit.

The Act has rightly embodied the judicial direction in the case of Sodan Singh v. New Delhi Municipal Corporation, that the street vendors must be given a say in the rules and bodies governing them by reserving 40 per cent of seats in the TVCs for the representatives of street vendors. But by creating TVCs without framing rules and scheme as per Street Vendors Act, 2014 rights enshrined in this Act might have been diluted.

Pie chart 3: States that have created TVCs but have framed neither rules nor schemes under the provisions of The Street Vendors Act, 2014.

Plan for Street Vending

Section 21 of the Street Vendors Act, 2014 provides for a plan of street vending to be formulated by every local authority on recommendations of Town Vending Committees to promote the vocation of street vendors covering various important matters like surveys, criteria for earmarking no-vending zones, identification of areas for restricted and vending zones, identifying natural markets, etc. But unlike the rules and schemes, no time frame has been given for formulating a street-vending plan, though clause (e) of section 3 of the First Schedule says that no zone should be declared as a no-vending zone before conducting survey and formulation of the street-vending plan.

The chart below shows that only seven states out of a total 23 studied, have street vending plans, though information for seven states could not be availed through any of the sources mentioned in the methodology section. That means that out of 16 states of which information was available nine states have yet not made any plan for street vending which is more than the states that have a street-vending plan. It need not be mentioned again that even before the passing of this Central Act many Supreme Court and High Court judgments have directed for making street vending plans.

Out of nine states that do not have street vending plans, seven states have formed TVCs. This shows that state governments have undermined the interdependency factor that calls for synchronized functioning of all regulatory tools required for desired results.

Town Vending Committees and Street Vendors’ Election

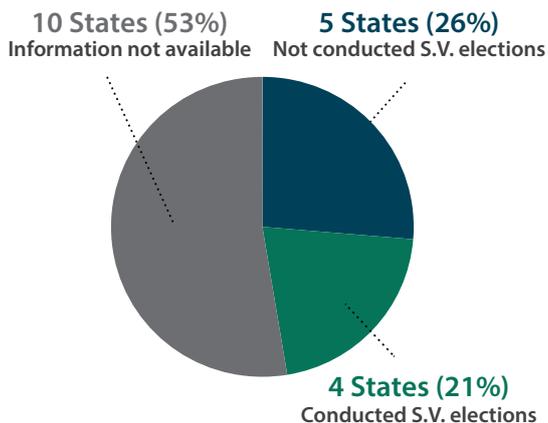

The above data show the position of the states that have formed TVCs. Out of 23 states studied except Gujarat, Nagaland, Tamil Nadu and Uttar Pradesh, all others have created TVCs. The study revealed that out of the 19 states that have formed TVCs, ten states have not conducted elections.

Clause (d) of subsection 2 of section 22 of the Street Vendors Act, 2014 says that in the formation of each TVC a minimum share of 40 per cent has to be given to the representatives of local street vendors. This provision further provides that these representatives shall be elected by the street vendors themselves.

But contrary to legislative provisions, these five states have constituted TVCs without having elected representatives of street vendors.

State Compliance Status

Andhra Pradesh

The state of Andhra Pradesh has yet not drafted rules but framed its scheme for street vending in June 2016. It also created TVCs and has conducted surveys as well as street vendor's election. This implies that the TVCs would be able to render its functions efficiently. Though, the state government failed to adhere to any of the timeframes for rules or schemes it has successfully created a structure which even has dispute resolution committees in a few areas. This state has complied with all the parameters except framing rules and publishing its schemes according to the Street Vendors Act, 2014.

Assam

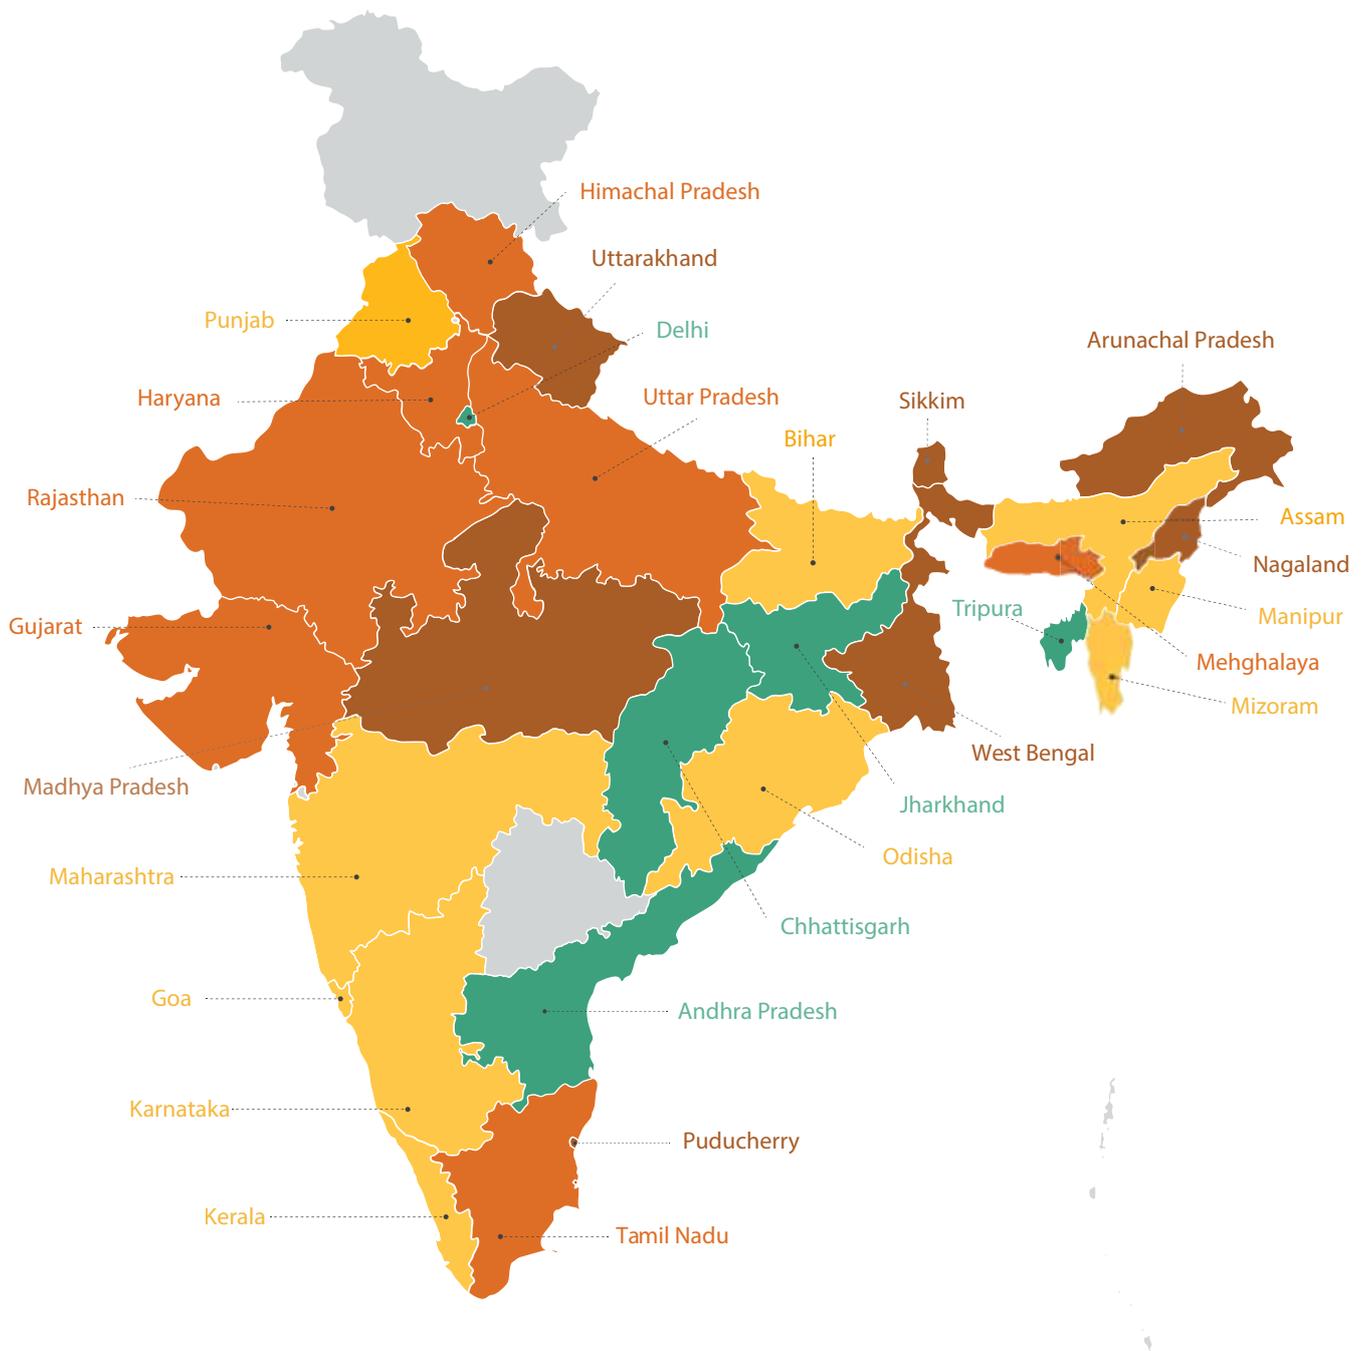

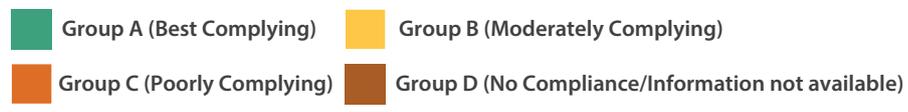

Assam though, made rules on February 26th 2016 after the expiry of statutory time frame but has not framed a scheme as yet (NASVI, 2014). Assam has constituted TVCs without conducting elections. Surveys of street vendors are conducted but have no street-vending plan. The implications of such selective compliance have been highlighted in the analysis above. The functionality of TVCs remains doubtful in such a scenario where there is no scheme.

Bihar

The position of Bihar must be studied in light of the fact that Bihar has a working state Act on Street Vendors. The table shows that Bihar has conducted elections of street vendors as well as constituted TVCs. The state has street vending plans in few places, but it has no dispute resolution committees. The central Act has provisions for dispute resolution committees which can limit the number of litigation arising in street vending.

Chhattisgarh

Chhattisgarh has framed rules as well as a scheme after the expiry of time frame as per Street Vending Act, 2014. However, the state constituted TVCs without conducting elections but it has conducted surveys. There are street vending plans in few areas of Chhattisgarh but there are no dispute resolution committees in the state yet.

Delhi

Delhi despite being the national capital region failed to frame schemes and rules within the statutory period. The union territory has still no street vending plan for its local bodies. Though Delhi framed both schemes and rules after the expiry of timeframe, it has conducted surveys in some of the areas. The compliance contradiction in Delhi lies in constituting TVCs without holding street vending elections. There is no dispute resolution committee in any of the urban local body of Delhi.

Goa

The status of Goa seems very bizarre as it has created rules, TVCs and also conducted surveys but has yet not framed scheme. How would the TVCs be governed is a not a question. Goa has conducted street vendors' elections. Except conducting surveys and creating TVCs, Goa has failed on all other parameters.

Gujarat

Gujarat has only drafted the rules but it has failed in complying with rest of the provisions of the Act. The state has neglected all the tools of regulating street vending which have been observed in many judicial decisions, various schemes and legislations. This is not only a violation of rights of street vendors but is also a complete indifference towards the issues arising from street vending which affect all.

Haryana

During the study it was found out that Haryana has a very similar state Act for Street Vending. The data above should be read in light of the existence of this Act. Haryana has conducted surveys and has also created TVCs. However, even after exhausting all the sources mentioned in the methodology no information could be collected about dispute resolution committees, street vendors' elections, and plan of street vendors and publication of scheme.

Himachal Pradesh

Himachal Pradesh has not yet framed either schemes or rules. The state also failed on parameters like formation of dispute resolution committee and conducting street vendors' elections. However, it has created TVCs and conducted surveys. Though again the same question arises in the state of Himachal Pradesh as to how will the TVCs function without any scheme and rules.

Jharkhand

Jharkhand has a very mixed response on the parameters in the study. This state framed rules after the statutory period for framing rules expired, though it has not yet formulated scheme. Jharkhand has TVCs and has also conducted surveys whereas the Street Vendors Act, 2014 provides that TVCs and surveys have to be formed and conducted as per the scheme of the state. It also has street vending plans in few areas but has failed to constitute dispute resolution committee and conducting street vendors' elections till date.

Karnataka

Karnataka has drafted both rules and scheme, though both after expiry of statutory period. The state also has conducted surveys and created TVCs (Kamath, 2016). However, no information could be gathered for dispute resolutions committees, street vendors' elections and plan for street vending. But an overall analysis shows that the state is slow but is on the path of compliance which brings it in the category of states which have both schemes and rules.

Kerala

The state of Kerala again like many others shows contradictory compliance status. Initially, it had TVCs and even conducted surveys in a few areas but without having any rules or scheme. Now, the state has framed the rules and scheme. There are no plans for street vending and elections have also not been held in any of the Urban Local Body. Though, Kerala has dispute resolution committees but these tools cannot work efficiently without supporting structure which the state has failed to create till date.

Maharashtra has failed in conducting surveys. The overall status is still doubtful due to no information on plan for street vending, dispute resolution committee and street vendors' election. Manipur has all the regulatory bodies except a dispute resolution committee. But the status remains doubtful like many other states because of not having a scheme yet. The state did not frame rules within the statutory time frame. Manipur has a plan for street vending in some of its areas and has also conducted elections for representatives of street vendors. TVCs are also present in some of the urban local bodies of Manipur.

Meghalaya

Meghalaya has merely conducted surveys and created TVCs in some areas. It has failed on all other parameters. The state authorities in Meghalaya seem to have not understood the interdependency of various tool of regulating street vending. Merely conducting surveys and creating TVCs without any parent scheme to guide it and rules for laying the scope and responsibilities of TVC cannot yield any result.

But the state has framed both rules and scheme, though both after the expiry of statutory deadlines. TVCs have been created in some urban local bodies. Odisha also conducted surveys of street vendors in few areas in the state.

Rajasthan

Rajasthan has created TVCs in a few areas but has no scheme for governing the same. The state has only framed rules and conducted street vending elections but has completely failed on all other parameters of regulatory tools. Without conducting surveys, elections have been held which reflects an compliance dichotomy. The table above shows that the state has casually implemented a few provisions without understanding the formation complexities like created TVCs before notifying the scheme.

Tamil Nadu

Tamil Nadu seems to be on an compliance path as it has framed rules and scheme after expiring of deadlines and has also conducted surveys of street vendors. However, even after almost three years to passing of the Street Vending Act, 2014 the state has only been able to reach at the compliance stage as reflected in the table above. No information could be gathered for the last four parameters in the table, therefore the overall status of the state remains doubtful.

Tripura

The state of Tripura though failed to meet any of the statutory deadline for rules and scheme, but has successfully framed both after the expiry of the period. Tripura has conducted surveys in some of its areas and also constituted TVCs. However, the state has still not been able to form dispute resolution committees, hold elections of street vendors or have a plan for street vending. Tripura also failed to comply with the statutory requirement of publishing the scheme in local newspapers. The overall status of compliance is thus very poor in the state as reflected in the table above.

Uttar Pradesh has still not been able to frame its state rules for street vending. However, the information for last four parameters in the table remains unavailable even after exhausting all the sources mentioned in methodology. The state has not created a Town Vending Committee in any of its urban local bodies. The table above shows skimpy compliance for the state of Uttar Pradesh.

Limitations

One of the major limitations of this exercise is its focus on compliance with the procedures mandated in the Act. This index does not reflect on the content of the scheme or the rules. The scheme may be too complicated, detailed and unfavourable to vendors but this index does not capture the substantive details.

Secondly, the data, though it was sourced from multiple sources was not available for all states and all the parameters. There is always a limitation of resources – money and time; therefore, it was not possible to try further and wait for more data. We filed applications under the RTI Act, but it was not possible for us to wait for disposal of appeals and file second appeals. We had to consider the pending information as “information not available”. At best, we called up the concerned government departments some times to supplement RTI information, but overall, the data collection could not be perfect.

Third, we did not allocate any negative weight to violations such as demarcation of no-vending zones before constituting TVC and evictions before the survey. This is controversial as courts including the Supreme Court have mostly upheld such zoning. The Act lacks any liability or penalty for such violations and merely stops at prescribing the procedure for evictions and zoning. However, this is important, and we will try to incorporate these parameters in the next phase though this may be challenging regarding veracity of data.

Fourth, one might like to use “distribution of Certificate of Vending” as a parameter instead of the survey conducted. This may be an option for the next phase.

Conclusion

Street vendors constitute a significant part of India's population, who are in need of a safe and secure livelihood. At present, rights of these vendors are being violated by the very state institutions which are supposed to protect them. In 2014, Government came up with an Act to protect rights of street vendors but as this report shows, proper compliance by states has not taken place yet. Even courts have showed unsatisfactory response in a desired implementation of this Act.

For instance, even though the Act clearly prohibits evictions under section 3(3) till a survey is done, evictions are still taking place. Firstly, we have witnessed that many of the cases post-2014 pertain to the issue of eviction. Secondly, many states have demarcated no-vending zones without conducting survey and constituting Town Vending Committees, it is in direct contravention of the Act. Courts as well as government authorities must look at the First Schedule under section 21 of the Act. Clause 3 of the First Schedule lays down principles for determination of no-vending zones which many government bodies and courts have not paid attention to. Third, some states and courts have tried to prohibit cooking on the street either through scheme or judgment. The central Act has no such provision. Such regulations are against the spirit of the central Act.

While the narratives of implementation are important, there is much to be achieved by organizing ideas in quantitative fashion. This Report attempted to estimate the compliance of Indian states with the Act and its principles. We identified a list of variables that – taken together with carefully decided weights – reflect an overall impression of how compliant the states have been as with regards to implementing this Act. The exercise results in an Index that ranks state relative to each other. Indeed, no index is perfect and there are limitations of data handling. Hence, we have given in the Appendix, fresh indices with changed weights, encouraging scholars to investigate these parameters further. Further, the Report does not delve into causes for non-compliance leaving it to future research. At this stage, the purpose was modest – examination of the state of affairs in compliance of the Act. This alone is a useful entry point to understanding the shortcomings.

It would be wise to read the Index in the light of court judgments. Some states that have done better on the Index, have not been supportive of street vending on above counts. For example, Delhi has framed rules as well as a scheme. But, initially the scheme notoriously prohibited cooking on road. Then, evictions continued on ground of no-vending zones, upheld by the High Court of Delhi and affirmed by the Supreme Court. Indeed, at this pace, it will take several years for the Act to be fully complied with, in the entire country. This makes the Report even more important. It shows the distance each state has to cover to comply with the Act. And therefore, could be used as a Policy Guide in setting compliance targets.

“ At this pace, it will take several years for the Act to be fully complied with, in the entire country. This makes the Report even more important. It shows the distance each state has to cover to comply with the Act. ” is interesting to see states such as Bihar, Haryana and Meghalaya showing major difference when implementation factors are given priority. This can be further explained or looked into by further investigation.
